GLOBAL WARMING

Global Warming refers to the gradual increase in Earth's average surface temperature due to human activities. Primarily the burning of fossil fuels such as coal, oil, and gas. This process releases large amounts of carbon dioxide (CO₂) and other greenhouse gases into the atmosphere, which trap heat and cause a "greenhouse effect". The consequences of global warming are far-reaching and pose significant threats to ecosystems, economies, and human health.

The primary cause of global warming is the excessive release of greenhouse gases. Industrialization, deforestation, and widespread use of vehicles are key contributors. As carbon emission rises, they form a blanket around the Earth, trapping heat that would otherwise escape into space. Over time, this has led to rising temperatures, with the past few decades seeing some of the hottest years on record. In addition, methane, released from agriculture and waste, and nitrous oxide from fertilizers also contribute to this warming effect.
